Spring cultural practices: Laying the groundwork for a successful season

Every spring, as the weather begins to warm up and the golfers start coming back to the links, there is one thing that you can count on - a flurry of activity from the golf course maintenance staff.

A variety of obvious maintenance and renovation activities are performed including; seeding, sodding, fertilizing, and mowing patterns established to name a few. But no one activity draws more attention than aerification. Greens, collars, approaches, tees and in some instances fairways will undergo their most disruptive but necessary maintenance activity of the season: core aerification. click here to continue
