

New Jersey fishermen work closely with scientists and government officials to develop plans that help to ensure that future generations will enjoy a good harvest of finfish and shellfish. They use information collected by scientists to determine how many fish the fishermen can catch, when they can catch them and what size fish they can catch. They also decide what size nets they should use so that the young fish and types of fish that they don't want can escape.