

Important News for New Jersey Immigrants!

Some immigrant families worry that applying for benefits such as food, housing, and healthcare assistance could impact their ability to get a green card. Certain people who apply for a green card or visa must pass “public charge” test in which immigration officials assess an individual’s likelihood of depending on public benefits. Public charge does not apply to everyone.

GOOD NEWS: Under the current public charge rule, which went into effect in 2022, many public benefits are NOT considered in public charge determinations. Immigrants can now access health care, food and housing support, and many more public benefits without fear of immigration consequences.

What does this mean for you and your family?

Below is a list of programs available to you and your family. You can apply for these critical benefits you and your family may be eligible for without concerns regarding the public charge benefit test. In New Jersey, we want you to have access to services like food, housing, and healthcare assistance.

Concerned about accepting benefits and the “Public Charge”?

If you are applying for a green card (lawful permanent resident status), visa/visa extension, or a change of status you must pass a “public charge” test to assess if the person will be dependent on government benefits.

The only benefits that are considered in the public charge test are: 1) cash assistance programs that provide ongoing support including Supplemental Security Income (SSI), TANF, and General Assistance; and 2) long-term institutional care, such as a nursing home, paid for by the government.

Immigration officials can only consider benefits used by the green card applicant in a public charge test. They cannot consider benefits used by other family members.

If you are unsure if this applies to you or a family member, please consult with an immigration attorney.
